It is known in systems for unlocking a vehicle, such as a car, to determine whether the user that wishes to enter a vehicle is authorized by checking his or her identity against a database of authorized persons. One such known system is described in the European patent application EP-A-0 652 119 (Nissan Motor Co. Ltd.), which describes an electronic entry system in which the vehicle itself carries a radio transmitter that transmits a signal back to a remote radio receiver associated with the vehicle registration database. At the time of entry, when the user carries an identity card, access to the system is allowed only if the identity is authenticated by a comparing means and if information concerning the user, such as the password entered, corresponds with other information concerning the user stored in the vehicle. The usual way to carry out this identity authentication is to store a set of access codes in association with the identity of the user, and use the user's identity to select a particular access code and compare it with the code stored in the registration database. Identity authentication is thus obtained by comparing the same information as is required to authenticate the user. The person using the system is thus confronted with a choice that may appear arbitrary; the code has to be disclosed by the user and compared to the code stored in the database, or the password should be revealed to the user and compared to the stored password, or some other method. This choice may be disadvantageous for some users. Such a system is also described in EP-A-0 579 114 (Nissan Motor Co. Ltd.). A known method of identity authentication of a user is described in U.S. Pat. No. 5,187,537 (Ford Motor Company). In this patent, a user is asked to enter an identifier (e.g., an access code) by means of 50b96ab0b6
